

The threaded patient history

Parents can use the beads to better prepare their children for the upcoming treatments. The various interventions become "visible". Thanks to the cord, everyone can see the point that the patient is currently at in their treatment.

The young patients hang their often meter-long chains clearly visible on the bed or on the drip stand. It is a good conversation starter and thanks to the beads relatives and friends can recognise what the owners have been through. This enables outsiders to better understand how much courage the child has already shown in fighting the disease.

Most patients keep their chain like a treasure or decorate their room with it even after the treatment has been completed.

A Mutperlen chain can also be something precious for parents. It stands for an individual and personal time that you have gone through with your child.

Each bead is unique and lovingly handcrafted by our beadmakers. This means that every chain is one of a kind. They tell the story of each child's illness and create a form of diary throughout the treatment.

Through the course of the disease, children and teenagers receive a bead as a small reward for each treatment. The young patients look forward to the next bead and this gives the respective procedure a different, less threatening status. Fears can fade into the background due to the anticipation of the "reward".

With the Mutperlen Switzerland project, we have taken up an idea that already exists in America under the title "Beads of Courage" and which was originally started in Canada. Impressed by the idea, we developed a programme tailored to Switzerland in 2012 and since 2013 our programme has been featured in all the hospitals with paediatric oncology units across German-speaking Switzerland.

When they are admitted to an oncological ward for the first time, young cancer patients receive a cord with the child cancer aid snail, their first name made of coloured letter beads and an anchor bead as a symbol of hope. In the following months, depending on the therapy and examinations, a wide variety of beads will be added as:
